

Think about the first time you ever remember wanting to hide something from your parents, but then you ended up telling them anyway (even if it was much later). It can't be something they found out on their own – it has to be something you ended up TELLING them (i.e., self-disclosure).

Analyze that self-disclosure episode (when you initially told them about it) according to all the features of Privacy Management Theory, boundary coordination types, and interaction characteristics of close relationships.